ET SEMPER HABITATIO IMPERATORUM EST – NOTES ON THE IMPERIAL RESIDENCES IN PANNONIA IN THE LATE ROMAN PERIOD

Zusammenfassung: In seinem Beitrag untersucht der Autor die Angaben der schriftlichen Quellen über Pannonien, insbesondere über die Stadt Sirmium, unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des pannonischen Abschnittes der Expositio totius mundi und eines der Briefe von Papst Gelasius, nach denen die Stadt als kaiserliche Residenz angesehen werden kann. In diesem Zusammenhang recherchiert der Verfasser alle spätkaiserzeitlichen Nachrichten über den Aufenthalt der Kaiser in Pannonien und kommt dabei zu dem Schluss, dass es in Pannonien außer in Sirmium keinen weiteren kaiserlichen Palast gab.

Keywords: Imperial palaces in Pannonia, Pope Gelasius, Expositio totius mundi, Pannonia, Sirmium

We know that there were several residences and palaces used by the Roman emperors in various towns such as Sirmium, Carnuntum, Savaria, Brigetio and Aquincum¹ during the late Roman period that are mentioned in the literary sources, particularly in Ammianus Marcellinus' work, and that some of them (such as Sirmium and Savaria) have been archaeologically documented as well (Table 1).² A clear distinction must be drawn between an imperial residence,³ a building complex with an imperial palace suitable for accommodating the entire court (basileion, palatium), juridical (dikasterion, curia) and representative buildings such as a hippodrome, baths and sanctuaries, and a palace suitable for a travelling emperor's short stay.⁴ Lactantius defined an imperial capital very precisely when speaking of Nicomedia under Diocletian: Hic basilicae, hic circus, hic moneta, hic armorum fabrica, hic uxori domus, hic filiae.⁵ Imperial palaces built for emperors when they retired such as Spalatum and Romuliana for Diocletian and Galerius can hardly be treated as genuine imperial residences.⁶ It is often assumed that one of the capitals of the late Roman Empire was located in Pannonia, namely in Sirmium, based on a similar building complex with a hippodrome and a palace in the town's south-eastern part.⁷ The springboard of my discussion is the well-known passage in the Expositio totius mundi et gentium (c. 57). In this paper, I shall study this passage in detail based on the subscriptiones of the Codes and other literary sources, with a special focus on the role of Sirmium.

The short Expositio or Descriptio totius mundi et gentium (of ca. 565 lines) was originally written in Greek by an unknown Syrian author, most probably in the 350s (see also below), but only two versions of its Latin translation have survived. The author offers a vivid geographical and commercial description of the various regions and towns of the Roman Empire, especially of the East.⁸ In a shorter section, the western part of the empire, including Pannonia, is described as follows:

Deinde Pannoniae regio, terra dives in omnibus, fructibus quoque et iumentis, et negotiis ex parte mancipiis. Et semper habitatio imperatorum est. Habet autem et civitates maximas, Sirmium quoque et Noricum.⁹

“The area of Pannonia is a land rich in everything, in crops and livestock and trade and partly in slaves. It is always the residence of the emperors. Sirmium and Noricum is among its great cities.”¹⁰

The passage dealing with Pannonia is interesting for us because the author emphasises that the province “is always the residence of the emperors”. A similar claim can only be found in the case of Antioch and Treveri in the entire work (Antioch: 23 Est ergo Antiochia prima civitas regalis et bona in omnibus, ubi et dominus orbis terrarum sedet ..., 32 Quoniam ibi imperator sedet; Treveri: 58 ... ubi et habitare dominus dicitur), justifying a detailed study of this assertion. In our case, it is striking that the province of Pannonia is mentioned rather than an actual town such as the capital. Some of the Roman emperors were born in the province (from Decius onward, between 190–200 AD; Table 9) or died there (from Marcus Aurelius onward, who passed away in 180; Table 11) or had been acclaimed as augusti (from Septimius Severus onward, from 193; Table 10).¹¹ The Roman emperors who were born here naturally had a residence, palace and estate in the province, as, for example, Decius¹² in Budalia near Sirmium, Probus,¹³ Maximianus¹⁴ in Sirmium, and Valentinian and Valens¹⁵ near Cibalae. However, this would hardly warrant the remark in the Expositio. The author apparently believed that one of the capitals of the Roman Empire lay in Pannonia. The only Pannonian town he knew about was Sirmium, calling for a separate discussion.

Based on the Expositio and Ammian’s description, Sirmium was a civitas maxima or *urbs populosa et celebris*¹⁶ and the most important administrative centre of Illyricum. The town was the seat of the separated praefectura Illyrici between 357–361 and 376–379 (and partly of the praefectura Italiae Illyrici et Africæ,¹⁷ *caput Illyrici*¹⁸), the comes/magister militum per Illyricum,¹⁹ later comes Illyrici,²⁰ the consularis/corrector of Pannonia secunda²¹ and the diocese of Illyricum.²² The town had a fabrica, a gynaeceum,²³ an imperial mint²⁴ and permanent garrisons.²⁵ There can be no doubt that it was by far the most important town of western Illyricum and given its imperial palace, it was the most suitable place to stay in Pannonia (Marcus Aurelius,²⁶ Caracalla²⁷ and Maximinus Thrax²⁸). However, it is also instructive to look at the information contained in the Codes to determine when Roman emperors issued edicts in the town and how long they sojourned in this Pannonian town (or elsewhere in Pannonia). We should also examine the reason for their visit from the period of the tetrarchy onward.²⁹

The idea that Sirmium became an imperial capital under Galerius was proposed by Otto Seeck. However, this could hardly have been the case since, following his proclamation as caesar (probably in Sirmium on March 1, 293),³⁰ Galerius had to stay in the East, and after his return around 299, all of Illyricum, including Pannonia, came under his control, but he nonetheless chose Thessalonica as his permanent residence.³¹ His presence in the province is attested but sporadically (around 299–300 and 302 AD; Table 3).³² In the previous years, it was Diocletian who spent a longer period of time in Pannonia, especially in Sirmium (July–December 290, probably until May 291; January–February 293; September 293–August 294; Table 2) most likely because of his repeated campaigns against the Sarmatians (cf. his titles Sarmaticus maximus).³³

Licinius was acclaimed emperor on November 11, 308 AD, during the imperial conference held in Carnuntum in Pannonia.³⁴ Afterwards, he remained in Pannonia³⁵ and all of Illyricum came under his rule in the following years.³⁶ It is generally accepted that Licinius moved to Sirmium and he spent most of his time before 316 in the town (and in Naissus,³⁷ cf. the silver largetio plates made in Naissus and in Sirmium bearing the inscription Licini Auguste semper vincas for his decennalia).³⁸ Regrettably, his edicts are not included in the Codes, and thus his movements cannot be exactly traced.³⁹ We know that during the bellum Cibalense in 316, Licinius' family as well as the court and the treasury remained in Sirmium and that following his defeat, the emperor fled from Sirmium together with them.⁴⁰ Based on its imperial name Liciniana, the municipal baths of Sirmium, the thermae Licinianae, were built in this period too.⁴¹ It seems quite obvious that other public building activity in Sirmium can also be linked to his reign. It is less known that Licinius had another winter residence in Pannonia because he travelled from Carnuntum to Mediolanum along the Amber Route to his wedding and to the meeting with Constantine in February 313.⁴² After the Battle of Cibalae on October 8, 316, Constantine I occupied Sirmium too⁴³ and following the peace treaty with Licinius, his co-emperor, Pannonia came under Constantine's rule.⁴⁴ During the period of the civil wars between 316 and 324, Constantine's presence in Sirmium is continuously attested: June 6–August 7, 317, first months of 318, October 24, 319, April 319, May 22–August 10, 320, April–September, 321, first half of 322, winter of 323–324 (Table 4).⁴⁵ From 320, a mint was active in Sirmium.⁴⁶ Thus, in the light of the above, we may conclude that Sirmium remained the permanent imperial residence of the empire's central part during this period (together with Serdica and Thessalonica in the Balkans),⁴⁷ while Constantine's Pannonian stay can be explained by his campaign against the Sarmatians in 322.⁴⁸ After Licinius' death in 324, Constantine became the sole ruler of the empire and his Pannonian visits became very sporadic (the last one was in April 332 because of the campaign against the Goths)⁴⁹ since he preferred Serdica ("his Rome"),⁵⁰ and his court was moved to Nicomedia and Constantinople after 330.⁵¹

Between 337 and 350, Pannonia was under Constans' control,⁵² but his residence before 340 was in Naissus.⁵³ After Constantine II's death in 340, his court moved to Mediolanum and/or Treveri.⁵⁴ Constantius' attested Pannonian visits were few and far between as nothing of importance happened in the province during his reign (except for the summit between Constantius II, Constantine II and Constans in Sirmium in September 337, when they divided the empire,⁵⁵ Table 5).⁵⁶ Following his brother's death, Constantius II stayed in the province twice for a longer period. First, he had to deal with the civil war against Vetranio and Magnentius (Table 5). After Magnentius succeeded in occupying Italy and Vetranio was acclaimed emperor in Mursa and/or Sirmium,⁵⁷ Constantius chose Sirmium as the most suitable place for his residence and stayed there between the winter of 350–351 and May 352.⁵⁸ During his stay, Constantius Gallus too was acclaimed caesar in the town on March 15.⁵⁹ The emperor left Sirmium only for his Pannonian campaign against

Magnentius: his presence is attested in Siscia, Cibalae and Mursa.⁶⁰ The campaign ended with the Battle of Mursa in September, after which he launched his Italian and Gaulish campaign in 352.⁶¹

The second Council of Sirmium⁶² was held after the Battle of Mursa, most probably in late 351, who gives a consular dating;⁶³ however, a date before the Battle of Mursa seems highly improbable; Photinus was deposed and exiled in the emperor's presence. The bishops made an attempt to force Photinus to recant his views;⁶⁴ however, he successfully countered by requesting a tribunal before the emperor himself. Constantius appointed senatorial officials as well as high-ranking officials from the Sirmium office of the praetorian prefect, Vulcarius Rufus, as judges; Photinus' opponent in the polemic was Basil.⁶⁵

Constantius had to return to Sirmium again in August 357 to deal with the Sarmatians and he immediately left Pannonia and Sirmium after ending the war in May 359.⁶⁶ During his campaigns, Constantius' presence is attested in Mursa,⁶⁷ Acimincum⁶⁸ and Aquincum.⁶⁹ During his Pannonian stay, Constantius convened two synods, one in late 357 (the Third Council of Sirmium)⁷⁰ the other in mid-358 (the Fourth Council of Sirmium),⁷¹ which he personally attended.⁷²

Julian the Apostate spent only two days in Sirmium: he passed through Bononia⁷³ on his way to the East against Constantius in September–October 361.⁷⁴ During their reign, Valentinian (364–375) and Valens (364–378) stayed only once in Sirmium, in July–August 364,⁷⁵ where they divided the administrative personnel of the court and the jurisdiction of the empire. Valentinian never returned to the town.⁷⁶ During his campaign against the Quadi and Sarmatians in 375, the emperor stayed in northern Pannonian towns, choosing Carnuntum as his summer residence⁷⁷ and Savaria as the winter one⁷⁸ (Table 7). After his elevation in Aquincum on 22 November, 375, his son, Valentinian II, and his Arian mother, Iustina, moved to Sirmium⁷⁹ where they spent the winter of 375–376 since his elevation to the purple was not supported by his co-emperors, Valens and Gratian,⁸⁰ but they soon moved to Mediolanum.⁸¹ After the Battle of Hadrianople in 378, Sirmium became Gratian's winter residence, where Theodosius was elevated to the throne in January 379;⁸² both emperors left the province after the short spring campaign of 379 since the problem of Alatheus and Saphrac's people had been dealt with (they also left the province but Gratian had to return in 380).⁸³ Later, Roman emperors visited the province because of civil wars as Theodosius did or when they travelled through the province (Table 8). In sum, Diocletian spent several years in Sirmium in the 290s, as did later Licinius and Constantine (between 308 and 324) and Constantius II in the 350s owing to strategic considerations, but apart from Licinius, all emperors had various imperial capitals besides the Pannonian town.

A brief discussion of the above-quoted other “imperial” palaces/residences in Pannonia seems in order. These are Carnuntum (308: imperial summit, 313: winter residence of Licinius, 375: summer residence of Valentinian), Savaria (375: designated winter residence of Valentinian), Aquincum (375: Valentinian's campaign, Valentinian II's elevation), and Brigetio (375: Valentinian's campaign, and place of death; Table 1). It seems more than obvious that in these cases, the praetoria of the provincial governors and *duces*⁸⁴ were chosen as the residence: in Carnuntum and Aquincum, these lay in the canabae (ad legionem or castra/hiberna legionis),⁸⁵ while in Brigetio, the praetorium of the legionary commander/praefectus or dux inside the fort (the presence of duces is also attested in Brigetio).⁸⁶ In these cases, a place was chosen that was convenient for a military commander as Ammian emphasised in the case of Carnuntum (ductori exercitus perquam oportunum).⁸⁷ In Carnuntum, Valentinian's residence was quite certainly located outside the fort (most probably in the canabae because the civilian and military towns were gradually abandoned⁸⁸ following an earthquake⁸⁹) as Ammian's account clearly shows: cumque exinde Carnuntum Illyriorum oppidum introisset.⁹⁰ The emperor was unable to find a suitable place for his own and his entire court's winter residence in Aquincum or in the entire province, explaining why he intended to stay in Savaria: Acircum moratus autumno praecipiti, per tractus conglaiciari frigoribus adsuetos commoda quaerebat hiberna, nullaque sedes idonea reperiiri praeter Sabariam poterat.⁹¹ It is assumed from Ammian's expression, regium lavacrum (“royal bath”),⁹² that the building complex unearthed in Savaria was initially the governor's palace and that it was rebuilt into an imperial one,⁹³ implying the presence of an imperial palace in Savaria too. However, the situation is not as clear-cut at all. According to Herodian's account, when Commodus intended to interrupt his campaign against the Germans in 180, Pompeianus told the young emperor, ἐκεῖ τε ἡ Ρόμη, ὅπου ποτ' ἀν ὁ βασιλεὺς ἔτι, “Rome is where the emperor is”.⁹⁴ In this sense, a house/palace/villa where the emperor stays also becomes a basileion.

According to Herodian's account, Pescennius Niger's own house in Antioch became an imperial palace when he was elevated to the purple in 193.⁹⁵ In the light of the above, one can understand why Cassius Dio found it necessary to explain the usage of the word palatium/basileion in the imperial period, particularly in the province: “the royal residence is called Palatum not because it was ever decreed that this should be its name, but because Caesar dwelt on the Palatine and had his military headquarters there, though his residence gained a certain degree of fame from the mount as a whole also, because Romulus had once lived there. Hence, even if the emperor resides somewhere else, his dwelling retains the name of Palatum”.⁹⁶ Ammian too used the adjective regius in this sense. Thus, we can hardly assume the existence of an imperial palace/aula Palatina in Savaria based solely on Ammian's expression. The lavacrum, the bath used by Valentinian, became regium because the emperor had used it. Similarly, Ammian used the word regia in the case of the usurper Silvanus' palace in Cologne where he was elected and killed in 355 (agens apud Agrippinam),⁹⁷ because he was elevated and killed there, and not because there was an imperial regia in Agrippina.⁹⁸

In sum, Pannonia and its army were among the most important provinces of the Roman Empire from a strategic point of view and several emperors had personal ties with the province. They were born or died here, or they were acclaimed augusti in the province. However, it must also be emphasised that whenever Sirmium or any other Pannonian town became a temporary imperial residence (even if for several years), but never a permanent one (semper as in the passage of the Expositio), there was always a military reason for it (civil war or Barbarian raid). Sirmium cannot be called a (tetrarchic) capital of the late Roman Empire, the only exception being the first part of Licinius' reign (308–314/316 AD) and, to some extent, Constantine's rule between 316 and 324.

It only remains to be discussed why the author of the Expositio claimed that Pannonia “is always the residence of the emperors”. First, we should examine when the original work in Greek was written. There is a general consensus that it can be dated to the mid-4th century, to Constantius II's rule, as it contains the title dominus orbis terrarum used by the emperor⁹⁹ and because there is a reference to a Gaulish ruler/usurper, most probably Magnentius or Julian the Apostate (c. 58 ... et imperatorem semper eget, et hunc ex se habet).¹⁰⁰ Given that Pannonia (Sirmium) is described as an imperial residence, the passage probably refers to Constantius' stay in Pannonia between 350–352 or 357–359 (Table 6). Sirmium was in fact an imperial centre during this period, where the court was also located, as shown by the participation of senatorial officials in Photinus' trial¹⁰¹ and Libanius' letters from between 357 and 359 addressed to Anatolius, the Illyrican prefect in Sirmium dealing with court affairs.¹⁰²

It is also worth taking a look at the other sources concerning Sirmium. Similarly to Mediolanum and Treviri, Sirmium was also depicted in the Tabula Peutingeriana, although only with the usual vignette of twin towers as in the case of ‘normal’ Roman municipalities.¹⁰³ In contrast, the most important imperial towns, Rome, Constantinople and Antioch, were shown as enthroned female figures, while the towns of the next tier of hierarchy lying along the Rome–Constantinople–East (?) continental route such as Ravenna, Aquileia, Thessalonica, Nicomedia, Nicaea and Ancyra were depicted as miniature walled cities.¹⁰⁴ Given that the map was probably made during the tetrarchy using information from the early imperial period and that it was later revised in the earlier fifth century, Sirmium's depiction is hardly surprising. It must be recalled that the Flavian colony was not even the provincial capital of Pannonia inferior since the seat of the legate and the legionary commander was in Aquincum and only during the tetrarchy did the town become the capital of Pannonia secunda.¹⁰⁵ The town's period of prominence was in the 310s–320s and the 350s; later, Sirmium lost its importance and it was therefore unnecessary to change the original vignette. There is a striking contrast with the Itinerarium Burdigalense, dated to 333, where various sections of the continental route between Burdigala and Constantinople were specified between larger centres.¹⁰⁶ Sirmium was the centre between Aquileia and Serdica and the total distance with the number of the mansiones and mutationes is listed (563,8–9 and 567,2–3).

During the Arian (and other) schisms of the fourth century, several emperors deposed and exiled bishops and clerics from their see to another town/province.¹⁰⁷ During Constantine's and Constantius' reign, these clerics were sent mostly "as far as possible",¹⁰⁸ but in many cases, they were sent to the see of their opponents or imperial centres: for example, Athanasius was first exiled to Trier (335–337 AD) and later to Rome and Aquileia (338–346), while anti-Nicene Alexandrians to Nicomedia in 325.¹⁰⁹ After the Council of Nicaea in 325, Arius together with Secundus and Theonas was sent to Illyricum, most probably to Sirmium.¹¹⁰ Hosius, bishop of Corduba, was also detained in Sirmium for a whole year in 355.¹¹¹ In 360, Basil of Ancyra was exiled to Illyricum, to Sirmium.¹¹² The three dates cannot be accidental: Sirmium was an imperial town during these periods (310–320s and 350s). The role of Sirmium was not forgotten in Christian circles of the fifth century. In a letter addressed to the bishop of Dardania written in 495–496 (Ep. ad episcopos Dardaniae), Pope Gelasius dealt with the problem of Acacius and the primacy of Rome. Concerning the discussion with the patriarch of Acacius, Gelasius mentioned the following:

*Risimus autem, quod praerogativam volunt Acacium comparari, quia episcopus fuerit regiae civitatis. Nunquid apud Ravennam, apud Mediolanum, apud Sirmium, apud Treviros, multis temporibus non constitit imperator? Nunquidnam harum urbium sacerdotes ultra mensuram sibimet antiquitus deputatam, quidpiam suis dignitatibus usurparunt? ... Nam quod dicitis regiae civitatis, alia potestas est regni saecularis, alia ecclesiasticarum distributio dignitatum. Sicut enim quamvis parva civitas praerogativam praesentis regni non minuit, sic imperialis praesentia mensuram dispensationis religiosae non minuit.*¹¹³

"But we laughed at the fact that they wish Acacius to gain precedence as bishop of a royal city. But did not the emperor reside in many times at Ravenna, Milan, Sirmium, Trier? Did the bishops of those cities usurp to their dignities anything beyond the measure anciently inscribed to them?

¹¹³ Gelasius Ep. 26.10 (Thiel = Coll. Avell. 95.53–54).

... The power of worldly rule is one thing, the allotment of ecclesiastical dignites, another; for, just as a small city does not diminish any prerogative of the government in it, neither does the imperial presence change the religious dispensation” (translation by K. F. Morrison).

In view of Gelasius’ passage,¹¹⁴ it was obvious to the pope that Sirmium had once been a royal town, a civitas regia, to which he added that even a small town, a civitas parva, could become an imperial centre by virtue of the emperor’s presence. This seems to be especially true in the case of Pannonian Sirmium and other ‘tetrarchic’ capitals.
